THE BOOKING PIPELINE TRACKER

Five stages between “maybe”
and money in writing.

THE FIVE STAGES

Booking dies in the follow-up, and the follow-up dies in your memory. The fix is not talent; it is a pipeline: every prospect on one page, every one at exactly one stage, moved forward on one weekly booking block. This is the same discipline a sales team runs, pointed at rooms instead of customers — because that is what booking is.

The rules that make it work: a show only counts as CONFIRMED when the money and the date are in writing. A HOLD is not a show. And nothing ever leaves the pipeline silently — a no gets logged as a no, with a date, because this year's no is next year's prospect with a warmer opening line.

1 PROSPECT

Rooms and promoters that fit the routing and the draw. A name on this list costs nothing; keep it long.

2 PITCHED

The email is sent — personal, short, with dates and one link that plays. Log the date; silence for ten days means one polite follow-up, then move on.

3 HOLD

A date is penciled. This is not a show. Keep pitching the same night elsewhere until the hold hardens.

4 CONFIRMED

Money, date, and terms in writing. Now it goes on the calendar, into the announce plan, and into the advance checklist.

5 SETTLED

Played and paid. Log the numbers — draw, merch, settlement — because this row is next year's negotiation.

“Three prospects per open night, tracked, never from memory.”

This tracker is a free tool from THE ARTIST OPERATOR: How Musicians Win in the Age of AI, and Why the Future Still Belongs to Humans by Jamil Apostol — the DISTRIBUTE job, operationalized. The book explains why the artists who tour are simply the artists who track: the pipeline is boring, and boring is what winning looks like from the inside.

This exact page is also the first thing Headline.world was built to replace: a real booking pipeline with holds, confirms, contracts, day sheets, and settlement history that carries from one tour to the next, in one place. Until then, paper works. Print two, staple, book the season.
